The Democracy Project, the Society’s initiative to renew history and civics education in New Hampshire schools, has made good progress in 2019. Since launching two years ago, the Democracy Project has targeted three areas in which staff and trustees felt the Society could have the greatest impact, all focused on elementary education where the crisis in our schools is the most serious. The challenge is clear—social studies has nearly disappeared from K-6 education in the Granite State, and kids in their early years are no longer learning about New Hampshire’s history or the fundamental ideas underlying American government. In response, the Democracy Project is concentrating on developing curricular materials for young learners, providing high-quality teacher training for educators, and advocating at the state and local levels for more support for social studies education.

In October the Society launched a comprehensive educational resource for both students and educators called “Moose on the Loose: Social Studies for Granite State Kids.” All the materials are available online via a new website at moose.nhhistory.org without the need for passwords or access codes.

This resource is a social studies adventure for upper elementary students (ages 8 to 12 years old), covering state history, civics, geography, and economics in a fun, interactive, and dynamic program. “Moose on the Loose” teaches children about New Hampshire while also introducing them to the important skills that will help them become active, informed citizens in a democratic republic.

The “Moose” website offers 18 units that cover the entire span of New Hampshire history, from the ice age to modern-day civics and government. Each unit presents history in a variety of ways, with images, stories, videos, infographics, and text, giving kids the mixed-media experience they expect in a world of fast-paced digital technology. All units also have lesson plans, projects, and assessments that help educators—whether in the classroom or at home—guide students in their explorations. A timeline, suggestions for field trips (with virtual field trips scheduled to be added at a future date), interactive games and activities, online reviews, and a wealth of primary sources, many of which are drawn from the Society’s own museum and library collections, add to the experience.

“Moose on the Loose” is not just about history and civics, though. It offers a fully integrated approach to learning English language arts, math, and science (continued on page 4)
In September anyone driving by 30 Park Street would have noticed a construction lift alongside the building. This equipment was being used by the company called Pro-Point Restoration that we hired to clean and repoint the historic building’s granite façade.

As is always the case, any maintenance or repair we undertake requires an extra level of care, given our building’s historical significance, as reflected by its National Register listing. Several issues needed to be addressed. The granite along the foundation had been discolored by plantings that were removed in 2016. We waited to see if Mother Nature would take care of the problem (through rain and sunshine), but it became apparent active cleaning would be needed. Beyond this cosmetic issue, the mortar joints in the granite masonry had begun to fail in many spots. This is not a good situation, not only for the long-term integrity of the building, but if not addressed it can allow water to infiltrate the interior. Indeed, last summer evidence of water penetration appeared in the plaster wall of our main second-floor gallery. An engineering inspection of the exterior masonry at that time confirmed that water infiltration had occurred through failing mortar joints.

Luckily for the Society, one of the country’s top contractors for this type of project, Pro-Point Restoration LLC, is located in nearby Pittsfield. Pro-Point, with the invaluable help of Society trustee Jim Garvin, developed specifications for the work in line with the Secretary of the Interior’s Standards for Preservation. To clean the historic masonry, only the gentlest chemical agents would be used, and great care would be taken in modulating the water pressure of the hoses used in the washing process. After much thought, we deliberately decided not to attempt to re-create the appearance of a “brand new” building, but instead to ensure that the process would be less harsh, as appropriate for a historic structure, by lowering slightly our expected level of cleanliness. In the end, Pro-Point used only pure water to wash the building.

The repairing of the masonry joints was also a delicate process. The building had been repointed a few times since its 1911 dedication, most recently in 1972. It turns out that the chemical composition of the mortar used then, in spite of good intentions at the time, was not optimal. The mortar lacked flexibility and, thereby, over time was prone to cracking, opening up the joints to the weather. For the current repair we went back to an earlier mortar formulation with a high lime content, making it more flexible and therefore, more durable. Additionally, great care was taken in terms of color matching.

Pro-Point, which has repaired historic structures all over the country, was an ideal partner for the project. Its client list is a highly interesting one, including the Bunker Hill Monument, the Theodore Roosevelt home Sagamore Hill, Fire Island Lighthouse in New York, and the Texas capitol, to name a few. Immediately prior to our job the Pro-Point workers were at the Point Reyes National Seashore in California, repointing a lighthouse cistern on a cliff five hundred feet above the waters below. One of the most remarkable episodes during that project, according to company principal Lester Baker, took place when whales could be seen swimming into the cove beneath the work crew, cocking their heads to watch the human activity.

Perhaps the most intriguing Pro-Point project was the restoration of Utah’s John Jarvie House in Brown’s Park National Wildlife Refuge. Located on a ranch 80 miles from the nearest town, the small stone house was the hideout of outlaws, including Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid. For the restoration, Pro-Point workers obtained volcanic stone from the local hills. From Butch Cassidy’s place to Edward Tuck’s . . . quite a range of clients.

through social studies. By this means, the Society hopes schools will be able to incorporate state history and civics, even if most of them no longer have dedicated time for social studies instruction. The integrated approach of the “Moose” encourages teachers to use it while simultaneously teaching English language arts, math, and science. For example, the site illustrates scientific principles by teaching how water mills powered an industrial revolution in New Hampshire. It makes math skills relevant by helping students chart a New Hampshire itinerary for a presidential candidate who has to cover large amounts of territory while meeting lots of people on a limited schedule and budget. It uses 19th-century newspaper articles about Irish immigrants to explore the difference between fact and opinion, a critical English language arts skill. The Granite State serves as a microcosm for the nation and its history, but it also serves as the perfect context in which children can discover the physical, creative, and social world around them.

All of this can be taught to students while helping them learn about the five key ideas that the Society believes characterize New Hampshire and the people who live here. The first idea is that while Granite Staters cherish traditions, they also embrace change. Second, New Hampshire is a land of immigrants. The third key concept is that Granite Staters have a symbiotic relationship with the land. Fourth, the people of New Hampshire are independent. And the fifth idea is that New Hampshire has had an outsized impact on American history. These five key concepts are woven throughout the “Moose on the Loose,” illustrating for kids the many ways in which our state is unique and has contributed to our national story.

During the summer of 2019 the Society also offered three teacher-training workshops to 125 educators, providing opportunities for teachers to learn about New Hampshire history and the most effective ways to instruct kids in social studies, such as using photographs, documents, maps, objects, and other primary sources. Teachers worked with national experts in social studies education and the Society’s own staff in intensive and inspiring sessions during which practical approaches were developed to get history and civics back in the classroom. The Society will be offering the four-day New Hampshire History Institute again next summer, along with a series of one-day workshops that go into greater depth on particular aspects of the Granite State, like New Hampshire’s role in the American Revolution or the expansion of tourism in the 19th century.

Recent months have also seen some developments in social studies on the state level, which should provide much-needed support for local school districts and educators. The New Hampshire Department of Education is getting ready to release revised state standards for social studies, which will also encourage local districts to recommit to this academic subject and help halt its marginalization in our schools. The Society played an active role in revising those standards. In addition, the New Hampshire state legislature convened a study committee this fall to explore civic engagement in the Granite State. With the Society serving in an advisory capacity, the committee focused much of its work on social studies education. The Society is also a member of a new group called the Civics Roundtable, comprised of Granite State nonprofits committed to improving civic knowledge. Other members include Citizens Count, the New Hampshire Bar Association and Foundation, New Hampshire Humanities, the New Hampshire Institute for Civics Education, and NHPR’s Civics 101. This group is working with educators, particularly the New Hampshire Council for the Social Studies, to identify classroom needs and develop instructional material for all grade levels.

Progress in this initiative owes a great deal to the dedication of the Democracy Project team, which includes the Society’s Director of Education Elizabeth Dubrulle and Assistant Director of Education Jenn Walton; curriculum developers Rebecca Federspiel and Kate Fox Ransmeier; education staff members Katie Corbett, Kirsten Hildonen, and Mary Morris; with leadership provided by Society President Bill Dunlap and Vice President Joan Desmarais; and technical support from Library Director Sarah Galligan. Nearly 50 teachers from all over the state are participating in developing the “Moose” curriculum as part of the Society’s Master Teachers group. They review lesson plans, try out activities, and provide input on practical classroom techniques. In addition, some outstanding classroom teachers have written or contributed to lesson plans for the curriculum, including Amy Goudreau from Maple Avenue School in Goffstown, Brendan Scribner and Rebeeca Sexton from Bernice A. Ray School in Hanover, Julie McNish from New Boston Central School, Megan Neurock from Cutler School in Swanzey, Barb DiFrancisco and Debbie Walter from Thornton’s Ferry School in Merrimack, and Catherine Kolar from Charlotte Adams School in Nashua.

There is still much work to be done, with the “Moose on the Loose” expected to be complete by the summer of 2020 and training sessions in its use already underway in school districts around the state. In addition, the Society is constantly building new partnerships with educators, administrators, legislators, and other nonprofits to improve the ways we support social studies education. There is every indication that our efforts over the past two years are beginning to bear fruit and that meaningful, significant change in social studies education is within our reach.

The New Hampshire Historical Society is grateful to Democracy Project donors for investing in New Hampshire kids and social studies education.

Researchers now have access to the Burley and Haley Family Papers, documenting the lives of an inter-related group of North Epping families both at their homes in New Hampshire and further afield. The papers were donated by the Joseph C. and Robert M. Burley Family Trust, along with a generous financial contribution to help process and preserve the collection. (For more information, see “Two Centuries of Family Treasures Donated to the Society,” in our Winter 2018 newsletter.)

Before the papers could be made available to the public, they first had to be processed, which involved identifying, arranging, and describing them in order to create a finding aid, or collection guide, letting users know what is in the collection as well as where within the collection to look for something particular. A descendent of the Burley and Haley families provided extensive background information about family members, including the date range covered by each individual’s papers. This made the arrangement and description much easier for the staff and volunteer archivist Sandra Wheeler.

After first becoming familiar with the collection, which includes letters, diaries, photographs, business records, and ephemera, Sandra next arranged the material into series to help researchers find what they need. Finally she stored the material in acid-free folders and boxes and wrote a 68-page finding aid, accessible through the Society’s online collections catalog at nhhistory.org.

Object Spotlight

On November 19, 1884, Hattie May Hoyt of Allenstown married Hooksett businessman Eugene S. Head, nephew of Natt Head, governor of New Hampshire from 1879 to 1881. The bride’s dress was made of white floral silk damask with needlework lace trim. A white dress trimmed with lace was a popular option for stylish women after the marriage of Queen Victoria in 1840. Before then, most women wore colorful wedding gowns that could be worn again on other occasions, but the British monarch set a lasting trend with her choice of a white gown. A dress such as this may have been copied from an engraving in a women’s magazine. It was made using a combination of machine stitching and hand-sewn detail work.

Hattie and Eugene Head were community leaders in Hooksett, where Eugene was owner of the family brickyard and lumber business. The couple had two children—son William and daughter Mary. Through the years Hattie’s wedding dress was well cared for by the family and is in excellent condition. After William died in 1960, his wife, Katharine, donated it to the New Hampshire Historical Society.

Lecture: Jennie Powers: The Woman Who Dares
Jennie Powers, known across the country as “the Woman Who Dares,” was cited by the Boston Post newspaper in 1906 as having arrested more men than any other woman in America. A humane society agent in Keene from 1903 to 1936, Powers was one of the earliest such agents to become a deputy sheriff in the Granite State. As a documentary photographer, she used her camera to protest animal cruelty, family violence, and widespread poverty in New Hampshire’s Monadnock region and beyond. Join Jenna Carroll from the Historical Society of Cheshire County to explore Jennie’s life story and how this dynamic activist of the Progressive Era took a stand against social vices at the local level. This free public talk is a Humanities to Go program, made possible, in part, by New Hampshire Humanities and the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Lecture: Canal Fever in New Hampshire and Vermont
New England had an intense but short-lived fascination with canal building in the first decades of the 1800s, when travel by road was slow and arduous and railroads had yet to be developed. Waterways offered a faster, easier way of transporting goods and people. Navigational improvements on both the Merrimack and Connecticut Rivers presented great opportunities to New Hampshire and Vermont, setting off a brief period of canal fever. Great plans were laid to link Lake Champlain with the Connecticut and Merrimack Rivers, and even to the harbor at Portsmouth. Somewhat unexpectedly, the coming of the railroads dampened these dreams, and it was steel rails that ultimately linked these watersheds, not canals and locks. This richly illustrated talk by transportation historian Frank J. “Jay” Barrett Jr. will explore this important slice of regional history. Admission is free for Society members; $7 for nonmembers.

Saturday, February 15, 2020, 1 to 3:30 p.m.
Family Program: Redcoats and Rebels: Gaming the American Revolution
